Pre-Production

1. Pitchboard

A pitch board allows web developers to get their ideas out to different clients. The idea of a pitch board is that if you handed this to someone, they would know exactly what you are doing. For my pitch board / project, I am going to build a website to teach Japanese. Above figure is the image of the pitch board created.

2. User Flows

For each user, it will be a different experience. Most users purpose for visiting would be to learn Japanese. Consequently, for them to get achieve their purpose, they would need to sign up to get notifications to their email or just in general, to keep track of their progress in learning Japanese.
We will use the Basecamp Shorthand technique to simulate a flow for the user. Here would be a shorthand technique flowchart:

For people who might would want to work for the website or to be part of the team, they would need to go to different location of the website. Here is the user flow for that type of user:

3. Wireframes

Wireframes are very important to brainstorm and compile the ideas of what the website would look like. For this project, we need to include two HTML pages. The two HTML pages that we would include is the homepage and the sign in page for the users who would like to learn Japanese. The first image of the user flow who give us the idea of how they would interact with the website (in order to sign up).
This first wireframe would be for the first HTML page (index.html) or the homepage, which would show the user general information and motivation to learn.
The second wireframe would just be a simple sign-up page. The fields would include email, age (optional field), name (optional field), and password. This would be like a profile or a way to keep track of their progress in learning Japanese.

4. Comps

Composition part of the process should take the least amount of time. Its where to put final touches onto basically the wireframe and to look as close to the final product as possible. You would include color, style tiles, and content.

To the left would be the comp for the Home Page

To the right would be the comp for the sign up page
